

A Direct Path to Answer the Biggest Question

...and why the answer has to be observed yourself.

Introduction

The human mind is a complex thing but it is a thing that can be taught what to think and what to believe. Adolf Hitler was reported to have said "If you tell a big enough lie and tell it frequently enough, it will be believed".

That is the crux of the problem with this document. Almost all of us spend years at school, spend years in front of televisions and spend our lives talking to others who have been brought up the same. If enough people told you that the sky was green you would eventually believe the sky is green. You may not believe this but if every programme on TV said the sky was green, if every magazine and internet article said the sky was green and if everyone you met thought you were "weird" because you didn't think the sky was green, you would eventually believe it was green. Over time the sky being blue would be a forgotten memory.

Once our minds are made up it is difficult for that to change. The problem is that what you see is not always as it seems. Take a look at this picture:

None of the rows are evenly aligned... right? Wrong, look at each line again. They are all straight!

Throughout your life you will hear things that will go against your beliefs and it is the job of your mind (ego) to automatically create barriers on your behalf. Like the example above, it would require a huge effort to convince you the sky was green but once you believed it those barriers would come back up again and no single person could convince you it was actually blue.

The main problem is that unless you have witnessed something first hand it will be difficult for you to ever believe it to be true.

The information below won't convince you that what is contained within it is accurate. The most I can hope it will do is chip away enough tiny pieces of your mind (ego) so you start to explore the notion that not everything you believe to be true is entirely true. You may even travel the same path I have done and then witness the impossibility of it for yourself.

If you can change your mind, you can change your life!

CHAPTER ONE

The afterlife

I've spent a lifetime listening and reading about people who talk about their experiences with life after death. They talk about heavens gates, family members greeting them, going to a light at the end of a tunnel and so on.

But my mind would tell me that although many people have seen this it is still something that their own mind could create. For me to believe I saw something real it would have to be something far outside anything my own mind could create.

I don't want you to believe anything I say. What I would like is for you to open up to the possibility that it might be true.

For thousands of years shamans across the globe have been doing what I'm about to talk about. In the western world we mock these ancient traditions but what if there really is something behind it?

What if you witnessed things so far beyond what your own mind could create, it could only be true and real?

And there we hit upon another problem. If you've never seen anything outside of your own mind you can't imagine what that would be like. We all go through the process of trying to picture what it would be like. We can't help doing it. But how can your mind picture something it can't create?

No amount of words will ever be able to convince you what I've seen is real until you've seen it for yourself.

So instead, let's talk about just how powerful an experience it is...

Drug addicts and alcoholics are some examples of the power of this experience. Once they come back from the experience many no longer take drugs or consume alcohol. What's more important is that the need to act on those urges have gone completely. You are probably now asking yourself how?

If you ask them they will tell you that they were shown their life in minute detail. They were also shown the true reality of our existence. When you discover what this experience of life is really about, you realise the mistakes you're making. You see that you are messing up what you should be doing.

All the urges our mind creates to fuel the addiction no longer have any power over you. It has no power because they have discovered where the power really is. The mind discombobulates the human 'you'. This experience puts the mind back in its rightful place.

What do I mean by this?

Very difficult to explain but in simple terms we think our brain and our thoughts make 'us'. The reality is that the brain is a tool and is not the real you. You have been brought up to believe that your mind, thoughts and memories define who are you and so you feed off of those thoughts. In reality your mind is a useful tool but it is one that you can observe rather than let it take control your life for you. Once it (the ego) loses its control over you, all the urges (like drug addiction and alcoholism) also become something you can observe rather than act on. The urge is there (so to speak) but you can observe it rather than feed into it.

In another example 20 terminally ill cancer patients, with weeks or months left to live were given this experience. Every single one of them came back from it no longer fearing death at all. Can you imagine what that would be like? To not only not fear your own death but to also no longer have the pain of losing someone you love. Yes, you will miss them, but the actual mourning process is greatly reduced.

Another unusual aspect of this experience is that you lose the control that 'fear' once had over you. If you fear spiders now you won't do after the experience. You won't cuddle into a tarantula after the experience but you won't be as fearful about that or anything else.

Fear is an interesting subject because if you really think about it you will realise that fear is instilled in every aspect of modern humanity.

How many people feel like there is a pedophile, rapist or terrorist on every street corner? How many people believe that if you don't accept Jesus as your Savior you'll be spending eternity in hell?

Fear is an integral part of the play we are in. It is far, far easier to control people through fear than it is to control happy and contented people.

This knowledge of experiencing what happens after we die is a huge worry for governments and religions. It removes the shackles of their control. If you know, with every fibre of your body, that there is nothing to fear in this life, all control over that person is lost forever.

Does it not seem strange to criminalise a chemical we all produce in our bodies, every day of our lives? More on this in a moment...

So why can't I describe the experience?

I'd like to give you an analogy of the problem I have describing it...

Let's pretend that you're sat on a beach at sunset. The sky is filled with beautiful shades of red and orange on soft fluffy clouds as the sun goes down. The sea is a lush blue with calm waters shimmering softly the reflections of the gorgeous sunset.

A friend phones you up and asks you to describe it but the only words you're allowed to use to describe it are words associated with a slug.

You would say that the sea was this lovely shimmering white slime that the slug leaves behind it. The sunset was amazing shades of black. The warmth of the sun was like having slugs on your skin, warming up to your own body temperature as they each suck your blood into them.

This is the problem with words. They cannot describe what is witnessed because the words needed don't exist in any language.

It is exactly like trying to describe the most beautiful sunset the world has ever seen but only having words associated with a slug to describe it.

Humans today can no longer think for themselves. Once they are told what is true they no longer question anything.

At school there is very little creativity. Pupils of today need to regurgitate what they are 'told' is true in order to pass exams. There is little to no questioning.

I hated school. I didn't enjoy regurgitating 'facts' and not being allowed to question anything. My religious education teacher really disliked me because I had the audacity to asked questions.

It is no wonder that I ended up a web designer because it is full of right brain creativity instead of left brain dullness.

What is this way to experience it?

Right now you, your family and every other person and living thing on earth is breaking the law. Each and every day of your entire life, your body is creating a class 1 chemical that is illegal in most countries across the world.

This is important so I will reinstate it: you are breaking the law right now by making a chemical in your body SO illegal, it is in the highest and most dangerous category of drugs in the World.

How can this be? How can they criminalise something we are all guilty of producing each and every day?

One thing that does really bother me is that DMT is categorised as a psychedelic. The reason why that bothers me is that with ALL other psychedelics your mind can create what is seen. With DMT once you break through your mind is redundant. There is almost nothing you see that your mind could ever hope to create by itself.

Infinity becomes something tangible. The universe becomes something rather tiny compared to what's outside of it.

Did you see the film 'men in black' where at the end of the first film the universe was one marble amongst many? The scale is just like that. What we think it is huge (our universe) really is that small compared to everything else. Note: I am NOT saying the alien playing marbles with our universe is real. I'm only trying to show the scale of the universe using that image as a reference point.

When we try to comprehend the vastness of galaxies and space it blows our minds but it is a tiny pin prick of creation in the grand scheme of things.

Infinity, by our concept of what we see, is small, not large. Infinity is something that you wrap yourself in and become infinity itself. All points in time and space are connected. It is only time and distance that gives infinity its scale but both are removed in the other place.

In the other place time folds in on itself and you no longer have time as a reference point. Distance is also removed so that is also no longer a reference point. Everything we, as humans, can utilise to rationalise what is being observed is removed, so there are no reference points to grab hold of during the experience.

What is truly huge is what's behind this universe. But even what runs this universe seems tiny compared to other things seen. The universe feels like it was something quickly knocked up one afternoon to relieve a bit of boredom. It's small scale almost felt silly.

Imagine if you had a world map on a small piece of paper and then picture your two fingers walking like this...

Imagine taking one step with your finger and touching Africa... and by touching it you were instantly there.

Now imagine our solar system on that small piece of paper and with one finger step you could touch Pluto and be instantly there.

Now imagine that piece of paper with thousands of tiny dots. Each dot is a galaxy. You could finger walk one step and be in a galaxy trillions of light years away.

Suddenly the distance and scale seems really small, as small as that tiny piece of paper. That is exactly what it felt like. Time was removed because time was no longer a construct of movement. Distance was removed because it was also no longer a construct of movement.

What we have here which isn't there is the variety of emotions. Everything there is safe and calm. Pain, fear, worry is something not experienced. We think of pain as something negative but what if it is purely an experience which you had never been felt before?

The key word in all of this is 'experience'; to experience something 'different'. To really get the most out of the experience (especially feelings and emotions) it would have to be done in a way that there is no safety net of knowledge to ground you to the truth behind us.

If you could remember what happens after the body dies, if you knew with every atom of your body that death is an illusion, you would lose the majority of the experience because you would know everything is fine no matter what happens. You wouldn't have depression because you would know why you were depressed. You would no longer be addicted to drink or drugs because you would know why the addiction was there.

People tend to wrap up this truth in cloak and dagger ways, to over complicate a simple truth.

Religion and History

Look at the religions of the world. How many of them say when you die that's the end of it? Almost none. They very nearly all have a very common theme, they all believe, in some way, that something DOES happen after you die. The differences are the fears that have been attached to this truth to keep you in the control of that particular religion.

Strip away the fears and you're left with them all agreeing that something happens when the body dies.

In the UK we have a book shop called WH Smiths. Go into one and pick up any mainstream book explaining the history of man. You should find it starts with the Egyptians . I have a problem with this, which also ties into the Bible.

Most of the texts in the bible were mentioned in much earlier texts. Adam and Eve, the great flood, the ark, garden of Eden etc. these were ALL talked about in much more ancient texts. The great flood, as a great example, was in over 170 texts, all much, much older than the bible.

These texts are never spoken about, nor given any reference in many mainstream books.

The Sumerians (4,000 to 5,500BC) are perhaps the most interesting of them all because they knew many things we only discovered in the last 100 years, like Pluto. They not only knew it existed but the color of it (and all other planets) as well.

The Mayans (2,000BC to 250AD) predicated every major solar event with amazing precision. Even today you could use their techniques to show you when the next solar eclipse will happen.

Snakes played a large part in Mayan culture. So much so that the temple called Chichen Itza will do something very remarkable on the summer solstice. On that day only you will visibly see the shadow of the serpent diety Kukulkan. They were not only clever enough to build these structures but they could also build them in a way on that one very special day of the year something spectacular would happen.

There is increasing evidence that our ancestors were far more advanced than we give them credit for.

The Pyramids in Egypt, as an example, were built using Pi and Phi. The golden ratio was also used.

The largest ancient stone block is over 1,200 tons. To this day we have NOTHING on earth that could move it, let alone stack them on top of each other with such precision you can't fit the edge of a sheet of paper through the gap.

They knew more about cosmology than we do, more about elements than we do, more about our existence than we do. We are so far behind compared to the knowledge they had it is amazing we've got as far as we have.

Carbon dating has caused more problems in the archeology field than in any other. More archeologists have had their careers ruined because of carbon dating than any other. If their discoveries do not fit what we've all been told they face the end of their career. It has happened dozens of times to even World respected archeologists.

One simply cannot have dating for humans going back hundreds of thousands of years (even millions of years in some cases) and expect to keep your career.

Science suffers from the same problems. You cannot expect a lengthy career if your field uncovers something that goes against the gods of science.

Although discoveries are proving what we know is wrong, it has to be shoe-horned into accepted knowledge or never revealed. Those who have been brave enough to go for it have paid a very heavy price for doing so.

This sounds like a conspiracy theory?

I don't care about them and I'm not a conspiracy theorist!

I don't have a single fully rigid belief. Even everything I'm talking about here isn't a rigid belief because the moment I set it in stone I can no longer rationally see another point of view.

To uncover our history you have to delve into the ridiculous and downright bizarre to find the nuggets of information hidden within them. What you then need to do is dismiss all of it until you find connections. Once you find connections try to debunk them. Once you have eliminated all the guff, whatever is left, is worth thinking about.

A good example of this in action...

A saw a webpage talking about giants. "What rubbish" I thought. So I started looking into it.

I came across many, many images of giant skeletons on Google but they were nearly all fake and quite easily provable as fake with some photoshop knowhow. I could have left it there but I was still intrigued so I kept digging (pardon the pun!)

I found several news articles about the Smithsonian museum being ordered to destroy thousands of giant skeleton bones. So I looked into it and found that too, was fake news and all lies.

Still I was intrigued. There was enough fake stuff out there to convince anyone it's fake but something still troubled me...

The bible and numerous other ancient texts state there were giants. In Egyptian, Sumerian and Mesopotamian pictures and tablets, depict Gods much larger than us. Look at them when you can, the gods are all MUCH larger than the people around them.

I then had to go back to 1890-1930 to find press articles announcing various museums displaying giant skeletons. Many museums around the World were displaying these enormous human skeletons but over the last 100 years they have all been removed and if you ask the museums where they are now they can't recall.

During these last 100 years more have been uncovered and the press articles can be found with time spent on research.

For some reason it isn't in the public's best interest but my point is this; If I had taken the conspiracy theory route I wouldn't have done anywhere near the amount of research I did. I would have believed the fake images and the Smithsonian lies and I would be no better than the person who didn't believe. With regards to our history, you have to go into some of the theories at some point but always be clear in trying to debunk as much as possible and don't believe everything you find.

I don't think the earth is flat, I don't think the Queen is a lizard from another planet, I don't think Elvis is alive. What I'm not going to say is "I believe this (or that) is true (or false)" because as soon as I give something a true or false attachment I then greatly diminish my reasoning for the other point of view.

It is REALLY important to keep an open mind to all possibilities. Even when you are sure something must be true don't make it so. Allow your mind to still be allowed to wonder between two view points.

Tibet holds the secrets to our past.

In the Western World we learn very little about the Eastern World and yet their teachings and knowledge are far older than Jesus and the Bible.

Tibet has had a turbulent 70 years and much of its religious buildings and texts were destroyed by the Chinese. Even today the Chinese suppress the people and their teachings in shocking ways.

In all my years of researching topics, many keep going back to Tibet as the root.

The eye above their temples are the biggest clue to our history. The eyelids are not quite right. They have a curve in the eyelid like this:

The most accurate image of Buddha is this one:

I cannot stress enough how important this small detail (a curve in the eyelid) is. It unlocks our ancient history and gives a credible answers to two of our biggest questions; who we are and where do we come from.

Mount Kailash in Tibet, Bucegi Mountains in Romania and the mountains in Antarctica all hold the secrets to our history. Not what was meant to have been found in tunnels under the Bucegi mountains but the actual tunnels themselves. The 'locations' are the key in which many things connect!

All through your life you will be told that "God created us" or "Evolution created us" or maybe even "Aliens created us". Do you spot a pattern there? They ALL talk about some external influence creating us. The answer is much more simple but it is also the one answer that is NEVER spoken about.

Our being here has nothing to do with God, evolution or aliens. The answer is MUCH simpler! If I'm saying it wasn't an 'external' influence... what is the only option left? What is the simplest answer?

What happens when I die?

My current view is this:

Death can be a traumatic experience. What you initially see will be whatever your current 'belief' is. If you think you're going to heaven you'll initially see heavens gates. If you think you're going to hell then that is what you will initially see. If you're expecting a light at the end of the tunnel then that too is what you will initially see.

Once you are over the shock of your death what you initially see will fade as you begin to remember who you really are and where you come from.

I still can't describe this place because there are no words I can use to describe it... apart from astonishing. I have tried in the past to explain it but the minds of those I told try to conjure up an image that is in no way reflective of my description. They conjure up images that the mind can create while I'm trying to describe something completely and utterly outside of what our minds can create. It is an impossible task to give a description for something we can't comprehend.

I would never recommend taking drugs to anyone. The only exception is DMT but it is important to understand that it must NEVER be taken too early in your life. You should only take it after you have learnt everything you need to learn in this life. It is a way of making the remainder of your life much more bearable but it will destroy your experience in this life if taken too early because of what it shows you.

I had something I needed to achieve in this life and I did it. Even so, it was another 15 years before I was truly ready to experience DMT. The strange thing with DMT is that it finds you. DMT is almost impossible to get hold of. One day I knew I was ready and within 10 minutes a source presented itself to me. Others I have spoken too have said the same. You don't find DMT, it finds you but only when you're truly ready!

This is the most profound piece of wisdom any person on earth can offer you. There is maybe one in every 60 million people who know about it, even fewer have taken it. This information is at the very pinnacle of answering who you are and where you come from. If you break through it will change your life forever.

I tried DMT a dozen times and on 15th January 2013 I broke through to the other side. I haven't taken it since and I have no desire to take it any more because that breakthrough showed me everything I wanted answering.

Anyone who knows me should remember a difference in me after that date. Work was no longer more important than family. After that experience family became the number one most important part of my life. I started voluntary work helping those in need. I got rid of most of my possessions. My whole outlook on life changed totally but it was all for the better!

I have knowledge of our true history but I'm reluctant to share it because most don't or won't understand it. Giving you the answer won't answer the biggest questions. You have to follow that path and experience it yourself...
